THE BUNCOMBE BUNCH.—As a rational being, I sincerely regret to learn, by the HERALD of this morning, that Mr. Charles Kemp has been induced to retire from the candidature of this city. The circumstances reflect signal dishonour upon the constituency he sought to represent.

to represent, and simply proves that disgusting character of any egotism, and effeminate are preferred before sterling honesty of purpose, thorough independence, and high moral status. Why, sir, in sober truth, any half dozen sentences from the lips of such a man (once a current of his mind is started) are worth all the ribald buffoonery of Lang, the "ad-captandum" trash of Parkes, the nauseating sapience of Black, or the contemptible idiocy of Fenbow; or, indeed, of any other jackanapes of the London Bunch!

Now, Sir, if East Sydney can produce twenty respectable voters and decent citizens, let them at once organize a party to elect a man of their own choice to the office of alderman, and I have sufficient faith left yet in the competency to believe that when the actual voters come to the poll the majority of them will hesitate before they strike their pens through his name—all their "bosh" about East Sydney severage notwithstanding.

least to give them the happiness of dreaming that they that they shall enjoy what it is not within their laws of possibility should ever be intermingled in one cup.

So far, however, as we can gather there are no signs of extraordinary bitterness in the elections.
The different parties are quietly pushing their way and accumulating their strength without any

actively opposing each other. No doubt where preference is possible there must be at the same time a conflict, but the exacerbation will be greatly abated by the use of the ballot. The

They can weigh the answers which the more forward endeavor to extract from the candidate, and they can go up to the poll and, according to their conviction of what is best for themselves and their country, deposit their vote. For the most part the electors will care nothing about secrecy, and we imagine that, in this city in particular, there are few persons who will hesitate to tell their friends or their neighbors hours in what direction their suffrage will be bestowed; but, if the ballot is faithfully carried out, there will, at least, be none of the savagery which sometimes disgraces elections, and none of the violent interference with the voter, which sometimes keeps the timid from the poll. The ballot-box, if not corrupted (which we at least do not apprehend), will express the public preference as to individuals, although we question if in many cases it will express any clear preference of any distinct policy. We may imagine; for example, that Mr. COWPER, Mr. MARTIN, and Mr. PARKES, and some one others of the candidates would be returned on the first polling day. It would puzzle Mr. ANDERSON, skilful as he is, to disentangle from this maze of inconsistency a popular theory of administration. All we could infer would be, that the constituency, finding a number of men of some force of character, and fully cognizant of their distrust and animosities would take pleasure in placing them on the arena of the assembly.

night it out. We are bound to say that, if our sense of propriety be somewhat offended by such a course, we shall look forward without great dislike to the time when we shall be spectators of the fray notwithstanding.

ON the QUEEN'S Birthday in Victoria, the GOVERNOR, before holding the usual levee in honour of reigning territorial majesty, paid a previous tribute to majesty of another kind—the majesty of the spiritual world—the majesty of intellects—the majesty of those regal minds who have left behind them works that “posterity will not willingly let die,” and of those contemporary writers who are emulating the same fame and usefulness. In other words, he presided at the opening of a new wing of the great public library at Melbourne, and lent the dignity of his office to do homage to the mind which lies enshrined in the volumes with which the shelves are filled; and, in so doing, without any dispa-agement to the temporal monarch he saw-thoroughly represents, he did fealty to what, is after all, the truest royalty. The real king of men is the profoundest thinker. He governs the world.

The superior minds whom he attracts around him are his courtiers, who interpret him to the multitude, and attest his authority by their own sincere acknowledgment of it. Not that great minds are generally recognised on their first appearance. On the contrary, they may be met with contempt or scorn, or bitter opposition.
But sooner or later, prejudice gives way.

he appeal to the instinctive sense of mankind as to what is true and good is answered faithfully. The man who has hit upon the fact of the case, while others have been groping blindly after it—who has deciphered the handwriting on the chart of history, which to others seemed an unintelligible cuniform—who has read in rocks and strata the processes in bygone ages of the architecture of creation—who lifts the veil from the phenomena of physical life, and traces the simple but all-embracing laws which nature uniformly follows—who spreads his glance to the farthest limits of the visible universe, and reads in the minutiae the same laws that had been discovered on earth—who studies the working of the human mind and evolves the subtle laws of thought and emotion—who traces with observant eye the vicissitudes and failures of human society, and whence throws light on forms of government, on audacities, and on public policy—or who, by his eloquence, expressed either in words, or arts, for architecture, bring men nearer to the beautiful and the good: these, all in their separate spheres, come to be the acknowledged leaders of the human race or, even when not fully acknowledged, as is at times partially the case, are none the less really potent, though derided of their honours. And a public library is the condensation of all that the great patient and the profoundest thinkers have done for the enlightenment of the human race. It is a Wallhalla of spiritual heroes, where the demi-gods sit in splendour and splendour knows possible to any suitor who wishes to receive the favours they have to confer. Philosophers, historians, naturalists, astronomers, chemists, physiologists, jurists, economists, poets, painters, artists, architects, divines, all stand ready to afford to the enquiring mind the choice results of their own life-long toils. It is impossible to over-estimate the value to an enquiring student of such a communion with the most comprehensive, the severest, and most penetrating thinkers that have gone before him.

He is as much animated by their example as he is instructed by their guidance—he is as much emboldened by their greatness as he is encouraged by their success.

If it is true that mind governs mind—that the higher governs the lower—it is difficult to exaggerate the beneficial influence of a well-used library in a modern community. With such an opportunity of gleaming thoughts, and such abundant scope for re-expressing them as is afforded by the platform, the pulpit, and

We confess it is not without some feelings of envy that we read the address in which Mr. Justice BARRY, the President of the Melbourne Library, detailed to the GOVERNOR the advantages the institution holds out, and the use that is made of it. Shall we make our readers' mouths water by repeating a few of the figures which show what luxuries our studiously disposed neighbours in Melbourne are permitted to enjoy? The central part of the building, for which £16,000 was voted, contains a handsome reading-room, fifty feet by fifty, lighted at night by gas, and open to the public from ten o'clock in the morning till ten at night. There are at present 13,214 books on the shelves, and when others now on their way out have arrived, and the additional money in hand has been expended, there will be not less than 25,000 volumes accessible. And these consist not of the trash of circulating libraries, but have been selected with a severe and judicious discrimination, and comprise the standard works in all branches of learning. The hall is open without an introduction or any fee, to all classes in the balance of commerce is an error, he answers that is what I have advanced in my exordium. If you say to him, But the balance of trade is a truth he will join, that is what I have established in my conclusions!

The school of economists will, without doubt, name me for arguing with M. de Lestiboudois. To combat the balance of commerce.

blat with a wind-mill. But they will say to the alance of commerce is not so old, nor so sick, nor so as M. Ganthier would allege, for the entire legislation, comprising Mr. Ganthier himself, is associated in its votes with the theory of M. Lesbousi-er. Nevertheless, I will not fatigue the reader. I will not go into the theory, I will content myself with submitting it to the test of facts.

The protectionists without censuring accuse our principles that they are not good except in theory. But let me, do you believe that the books of merchants and goods in practice? It seems to me that if there is anything in the world which has a practical authority upon it, it is the book of the merchant.

M. T.—sent from Havre a ship to the United States freighted with French merchandise, and parti-

With that description which they call Paris cotton, amounting in value to 200,000 fr. This was the sum declared by the Consignee. On his arrival at New York he found that the Consignee had incurred 10 per cent. of expenses and paid 30 per cent. of duties which made it amount to 280,000 fr. It then sold at 320,000 fr. The Consignee then made a profit of 40 per cent. profit: that is, 40,000 fr., and produced a total of 320,000 fr., which the consignee converted into cotton. These cottons had to bear 10 per cent. expenses for their storage, insurance, and commission. It was allowed that the Consignee should have a share of 352,000 fr., and that was the sum entered in the records of the Customs. In the end, the Consignee realised, on this return, 20 per cent. profit.

that is, 72,000*l.*, or in other terms, the cottons were sold for 400,000*l.* If M. de Leshanville required it, I could show him the extract from the books of M. T. —. He would there find that the account of profit and loss — that is to say profits — two articles: one 40,000*l.*, and the other 200,000*l.* And M. T. is well persuaded that in this respect his accounts have not deceived him.

Nevertheless what say the figures of the Customs in this operation to M. de Leshanville? They inform him that France exported 200,000*l.*, and that it imported 400,000*l.* Thus the honorable declaration concludes that France has by this operation lost her precious economy, and that she has imported

A little time after, M. T. sent another ship laden with 200,000f., the produce of her national labour, to the unknown ship sank in going out of the port, and there did not remain a single article of merchandise inscribed in his books two small entries of Miscellaneous merchandise. To E., 200,000f. purchases of different articles sent by the ship N. Profits and losses—to miscellaneous merchandise, 200,000f. for the firm and total-loss of the

During this time the Customs inscribed on its side 200,000f. on the tables of expropriation, and as would never have anything in the tables importation it follows that M. de Lesboudois and de Chamberlain saw in this shipwreck a clear and net of 300,000fr. to France.

And there is still a conclusion to be drawn from according to the theory of the balance of commerce, France has a simple means of obtaining vast her capital. It suffices for this, that after passing merchandise through the Customs she could cast it into the sea. In this way the exportation would equally mount up her capital, and the imports would be nil, and even impossible, and we could gain all the profits which would up to this is a pleasant, save the protectionist. It is possible that we should talk such absurdities. You think, nevertheless, and what is more you realise it, you impose practically upon your fellow citizens as much at least as it depends upon you.

The truth is, we should strike the balance of commerce on the one side, and calculate the enormous profit on the exterior commerce by the loss of importations on the exportations. This excess, expenses being deducted, forms the real gain. In this theory, it is true, directly brings with it free trade. In this theory, gentlemen, I deliver to you as all those who will be so good as to read it, would exaggerate them as much as you will, there is nothing question in this proof. Suppose, if this would use you, that strangers inundated us with all sorts of useful merchandise without demanding anything; and at our importations are infinite, and our exportations; I would defy you to prove that we should be poorer.

THE DISCOVERED USE OF A WATERMAN'S BOAT, AND ASSOCIATION OF SOMETHING WORSE.—Early yesterday morning, a waterman's boat was found adrift at the city, near Macquarie Ford, at one time used by the O. and C. Company's steamers, and from the marks blood upon different parts, suspicions were held that there had been some foul play in connection with it. Inspector McGill, on being informed of the circumstance, proceeded to examine the boat, which was found to bear the name of "Thomas Berry, licensed waterman," from whom it was learned, that she had supernaturally taken from her moorings, at the rear Quay, between the hours of eight on Monday night and daylight yesterday morning. A quantity of blood appeared on the fore and aft planking of the sides, and on the inside of the gunwale, and also on the flooring of the boat. The blood of the boat was not in sufficient quantity to indicate much had been shed inside; but from the fact that the marks continued over the gunwale, there is room for conjecture whether the boat had not been used for some more tragical purpose than being pressed into the service of some selfish individual who was returning from some party which had been previously given by Bacchus and by Mars, and no in the boat poured out a sanguinary tribute to the latter; or, though it is less probable, that some eternal fisherman had, in hauling home his finny prey, allowed the blood from their gills to produce the milk-nooking stains.

AGRICULTURAL AND DAIRY FARMS TO LET.
FOR a long time past, the splendid estate is now to be leased in various sized lots.
 —The Hineston Farm, estimated to contain about 5500 acres of good land, with 7200 acres pre-emptive land, leased from the Government.
 On this farm are the house, large woodshed, barn, stable outbuildings, and numerous cultivation paddocks, &c.
 The soil is excellent, and the water is not abundant daily supplied with water by the Wellmouth River over-flowing creeks. This is a most excellent farm for beef and dairy cattle, and the fish and sheep would make good and profitable additions. The fish would make cool water and lively, being built up with very chalky and loamy soil; it is 120 feet long and 45 feet wide.

The Gibraltar Creek Farm, estimated at about 2500 acres purchased land, together with 3600 acres pre-emptive land.

3.—The property is well adapted for a dairy farm. It is partly enclosed by a well constructed stone wall, and is bounded to the Wollondilly River, also creeks running through it, well supplied with water.

4.—The property is well stocked with cattle, and sheep, and 3000 acres purchased land, and 3000 acres pre-emptive land. This is an excellent farm, especially for dairy purposes.

5.—The Junction Creek Farm, estimated to contain about 3200 acres purchased, and 5800 acres leased land. There is a very good agricultural land. It is well watered, and there is much good reserve land.

6.—Farms of from 50 to 200 acres, (as may be required) rich agricultural land, with river frontages, will also be offered. These farms are well stocked with sheep, and farmers' cattle, on reasonable terms. Rents moderate.

7.—The property is well improved, if required. An allowance will be made for improvements if required in each case in the lease.

8.—The property is well situated in Railways, and close to or near to Arturhale, produce may nearly be sent to Sydney at a trifling expense; and Arturhale is already a place for growing some of the best wheat in New South Wales.

Part of the land is cleared and stumped, and the principal portion is open forest land, with very few trees to be cut.

MR. WILLIAM EDWARD ELLIS, Arturhale, near Berriina, will show the respective farms; and for further particulars apply to MR. WILLIAMSON, Auctioneer, Sydney; or to the undersigned.
